
Lameness is a major problem in dairy production both in terms of reduced milk production and compromised animal welfare. It is important to evaluate the degree of lameness in individual cows. A lameness scoring system based on a number of existing scoring systems is proposed. The system was evaluated in relation to intra- and interobserver agreement. The results show that the scoring system is reasonably reliable.